I was pleasantly surprised by Dave Itzkoff's memoir of his efforts to reconnect with and better understand his father whose long addiction to cocaine had made him a shadow figure in his son's life. I appreciated that this was not a book charting the actual recovery of his dad or a book that solely focused on the author's childhood and how that childhood suffered under his father's addiction.

Cocaine's Son is a tender memoir about the author's coming of age in the shadow of his father, a fur coat trader addicted to cocaine. Amidst the recent popularization of addiction memoirs that do as much to glorify the pleasurable excesses of drug and alcohol addictions as they chronicle the devastating lows, Cocaine's Son adopts a less dramatic and perhaps more realistic approach.

David Sedaris is one of my favorite authors, mostly because he can write about his family in a way that is both sardonic and tender. Dave Itzkoff's aim is not for a memoir written in the style of David Sedaris, but he is aiming squarely for a book that examines family relationships — specifically, the one between father and son.
